

"All that you Change, Changes You": A Youth Participatory Action Research Qualitative Study on Black Girls Navigating Institutional Harm Using School-Based Mentorship Program Design

Kristin Kelly, Ph.D. Candidate, Language, Literacy, and Culture; Spring 2025 Graduate Student Fellow

This project explores the journey of a Black woman educator working with Black girls in an in-school mentorship program as they collaborate to navigate and resist oppressive systems. It examines how imagination helps conceptualize frameworks to understand the effects of systemic racism that Black girls experience and navigate within educational environments. By reimagining education and challenging societal narratives of what it means to be a Black girl, this work creates intersections and avenues to explore the multiplicities of Black girl identity and the reimagining of programs that support Black girls.

"Ya es otro tiempo el presente:" Indigenous ideas of time in the Andes during the Age of Revolutions (1780-1830)

Silvia Escanilla Huerta, Postdoctoral Fellow for Faculty Diversity, History

In late eighteenth-century judicial records, in the context of several indigenous riots and rebellions that shook the viceroyalty of Peru, different actors would mention the expression "Ya es otro tiempo el presente (this is a different time.*)" Ethnohistorians have demonstrated that Andean peoples did not possess a diachronic understanding of time but rather an idea of the past as implicit within the present and in constant interaction with it. Conversely, the future was perceived as a millenarian, catastrophic change or transformation, a necessary transformation that had no sense of continuity with the past but a complete transformation. So what did the expression "ya es otro tiempo el presente mean? Silvia Escanilla Huerta will share her ideas about what this expression might have meant, presenting a close reading of primary sources and building on the work of anthropologist Frank Salomon, subaltern theorist Silvia Rivera Cusicanqui, and intellectual historian Reinhart Koselleck, among others.
