As society grapples with challenges both internal and externally driven, how should policymakers think about evidence when making decisions? Michael Fernandez discusses the implications of evidence-based decision-making in the context of voting (e.g. informing local governments about best practices regarding voting machines) and concerning public health (e.g. informing state actors about environmental and health-related impacts from PFAS). This talk will highlight how we, as social science scholars and students, might influence decision-making through evidence-based scholarship.

Organized by the Center for Social Science Scholarship.
